How do I discipline my child?

The American Academy of Pediatrics issued guidance in 2018 about disciplining children:

“Disciplining your child is not easy, but it is a vital part of good parenting. The AAP recommends a three-step approach toward effective child discipline. First, establish a positive, supporting and loving relationship with your child. Without this foundation, your child has no reason, other than fear, to demonstrate good behavior. Second, use positive reinforcement to increase the behavior you want from your child. Third, if you feel discipline is necessary, the AAP recommends that you do not spank or use other physical punishments.”

So what should I do? Positive Behavior Support!

Positive, loving relationships in the home are a primary foundation of Positive Behavior Support - adults model this with each other, cultivate this with their kids. Positive reinforcement is key!

There is no right or wrong way to parent. The principles in Positive Behavior Support lead all families toward greater success and happiness.

Positive Behavior Support is a research-based approach to increase quality of life for people and families and decrease problem behavior by teaching new skills and making changes in a person’s environment.

What can I do differently starting today?

Be proactive - plan for success
- Set clear expectations for what to do instead of what not to do
- Use calendars and schedules to make things predictable
- Help your children to stay engaged in activities during downtime/leisure time
- Offer choices instead of giving demands
- Offer to work together on hard tasks
- Make hard times fun by incorporating things like music, snacks, or costumes

Teach skills needed to be successful
- Always model good behavior and words, including how to get needs met
- Write down, post, and refer back to expected behavior
- Keep teaching - children learn over time and at different rates - stick with it

Reinforce good behavior
- Pay attention to positive behavior
- Set up, and deliver, something special after kids meet your expectations
- Allow a pass sometimes on tough tasks when kids have been behaving well

Respond to problems by patiently teaching what’s right, not punishing
- Take a deep breath - if you cannot be patient in the moment, walk away and come back

---

Do This: Encourage and follow through without nagging
Be nearby to help with expected tasks and focus on fun to be had after tasks are done.

Do This: Power Struggles
Parents can withdraw from the conflict but still stick to original expectations of getting something done.

Core features

- Identify goals
  - what needs to happen more? or less? be specific!

- Assess
  - pay attention to what happens right before things go poorly, and what happens right afterward.

- Generate a plan and stick to it
  - include proactive, teaching, and reinforcement components, and be consistent so you can evaluate if your plan is the right one.

- Gather information
  - about what’s working and what isn’t: is your child making progress on the goals you identified?

Stay optimistic, be mindful!
Lots of research shows that it helps to be attentive and present to the current moment. Let go of the thoughts that bring you down, focus on your positive intentions for yourself as a parent and for your kids. Everyone will feel better and do better!

Positive Behavior Support is for every parent!
Whether you are a new parent, are dealing with the “terrible twos”, or navigating the emotional swings of adolescence, you will find Positive Behavior Support approaches that work for your family.
